Category:Max Payne (video game series) fr:MAX PayneQ: Graceful recovery from an API error in Python 3.6? I have a scenario where a user in a web app produces an invalid, out of context path in an API call. We've tried throwing a KeyboardInterrupt exception, but then the web app doesn't recover gracefully and instead throws the exception back at us, and we don't know which invocation triggered the exception. I would prefer to just return a 500 instead of possibly losing an hour's worth of data. Is there a clean way to handle this in the API? I'm already anticipating getting "No connection could be made because the target machine actively refused it" errors, and those are completely predictable and easy to recover from. I don't want to replicate that logic (send a web request, retry if we get timeout, send request, if we get 500 error, etc.) over and over again. Is this even supported in Python 3? I would assume not, but that's why I'm asking. A: You could use a Transport Error. From the relevant Wikipedia page: A Transport Error is any error, generated by the kernel, which is not an exception. It is a type of error that means that the operation has failed and that the caller should handle it by considering the outcome to be the normal return value of the function. In practice, if a Transport Error is encountered the operating system will try to recover. This will happen (likely) at the kernel, if there is no specific transport (HTTP/ 1cb139a0ed
