Modern military firearms Modern firearms include pistols, rifles, and shotguns. Although their use is increasing in some places, firearms are usually reserved for special forces and other militaries. Some militaries are developing small weapons for their own armed forces, but most have abandoned the idea of designing small weapons. Pistols and revolvers The standard firearm for most militaries is the pistol. Although the term "pistol" may be used loosely to describe any firearm that has a barrel shorter than about 50 cm, it is generally understood to refer to a fully-automatic or semi-automatic weapon whose grip is held more-or-less sideways and that is between 40-60 cm long. The last significant handgun to use a magazine fed from an integral 'pistol' grip was the Colt 1911, but in late twentieth century military combat the main handgun most often used has been the Glock pistol. Handguns used for military purposes Although many handguns were used by armies in the late 19th century and early 20th century, most militaries now use the small and light Colt 1911 or its variants. There are two main types of military pistol: semi-automatic pistols which automatically eject spent casings, and full-automatic pistols which feed automatic ammunition into the chamber during fire, then fire continuously until empty. Full-automatic pistols are no longer used by the military except in small numbers, while most semi-automatic pistols are used both by the military and by civilians. Full-automatic and semi-automatic pistols tend to be fairly heavy, and are more accurate at longer ranges than automatic rifles. They have much higher rates of fire than automatic rifles, which is useful in combat situations. Semi-automatic pistols are more commonly used by the military than full-automatic pistols, because they are lighter and less accurate (so that a larger gun-crew is needed to compensate) and can be more easily concealed by troops. The most important semi-automatic pistol in the world is the H&K G3, which has won the Luger of the Century award from the German magazine Europa Sport. Rifles The oldest military rifles were muzzle-loading guns, which are still used by several militaries in the world. The 5.45 mm Bernd Weidenbach C96G is an example of a carbine, or heavy-barrelled rifle, which was introduced by the German Army in 1944, replacing the standard Mauser. As revolvers
